THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

Thursday, December 6, 2007

OPINION

Still a Dangerous World

By Lawrence Krauss

The next time we see the U.S. presidential debate, the media reports will focus on the candidates' jabs about the economy, the environment, foreign policy.

The U.S. will face a major challenge in the 2008 campaign.

The debate will work to assure that science becomes a central issue in the presidential campaign.

The candidates need to be clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.

The debate will work to ensure that the candidates are clear about their views on issues such as how to deal with climate change, nuclear arms, and nuclear power.